UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

WESTERN CREDIT COMPANY, INC.,
A corporation,

Appellant and Petitioner,

-vs-

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,

Respondent.

APPELLANT'S BRIEF

PLEADINGS AND JURISDICTIONAL FACTS

This appeal and petition is for a review of a decision of the Tax Court of the United States determining that appellant and petitioner (hereinafter called "petitioner") is a personal holding company, and is deficient in total personal holding company taxes for the period January 1, 1949 through April 30, 1956 in the principal sum of $32,014.36. The statutes involved are those relating to personal holding companies being Sections 500, et seq, Revenue Code of 1939, and Sections 541, et seq, Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

1 Notice of deficiency was issued by respondent
2 on May 21, 1959 (Tr. 7-31). On August 17, 1959,
3 petitioner filed its petition in the Tax Court for a 4 redetermination of the deficiency. Generally, the 5 petition alleged the petitioner's income consists of 6 less than 80% personal holding company income, and 7 petitioner is not therefore a personal holding company 8 subject to personal holding company taxes. The 9 respondent's answer placed this allegation in issue.
10 Since most of the facts of the case were stipulated,
11 and the pleadings are not in question on this appeal, 12 further review thereof at this point appears unnecessary.

13 The case came on for trial before the Tax
14 Court, sitting at Helena, Montana, on September 26, 15 1961 (Tr. 41). The Tax Court issued its findings, 16 opinion and decision on September 28, 1962 (Tr. 141).
17 By stipulation filed with the Tax Court November 21,
18 1961, the parties agreed, pursuant to the provisions 19 of 26 USC Section 7482 (b), that the petition for 20 review of the decision of the Tax Court might be 21 filed in this court (Tr. 161). On December 24, 1962, 22 petitioner filed its petition for review of the Tax
23 Court decision by this court.

24 STATEMENT OF THE CASE

25 The opinion of the tax court (Tr. 141)

1 contains a review of the evidence which, for the most 2 part, is adequate for the purpose of this appeal.

3 The parties stipulated, (Tr.34) and the trial court 4 found, based upon the stipulation entered into by the 5 parties, and the testimony submitted by the taxpayer 6 on direct and cross examination at the time of trial, 7 the following facts:

- 8 1. Petitioner was incorporated in Montana in 9 1948 to take over a business previously 10 operated as a partnership by its principal 11 incorporators, and thereafter operated as a 12 small loan, personal finance, and mortgage
13 loan business in the city of Great Falls.
14 At all times, more than 50% of its stock was 15 owned by five or fewer persons.
- 16 2. Regular United States corporation income tax 17 returns, form 1120, were duly filed for each 18 of the years, or taxable periods involved, but 19 no personal holding company returns were filed 20 at any time.
- 21 3. During the periods referred to, taxpayer
22 operated under the general corporation statutes
23 of Montana, the state having no law specifi-24 cally regulating small loan, personal finance, 25 or mortgage loan companies, or licensing them

1 as such. Montana did have statutes relating 2 to the subject of usury, copies of which have 3 been submitted as exhibits, All of taxpayer's 4 income, save for a small amount of rentals,
5 derived from the operation of this business.

6 4. In connection with every loan made by taxpayer,
7 two separate charges were made. In the tax-
8 payer's nomenclature, one of these was called 9 a "contract charge", and one was called a 10 "carrying charge". The contract charge
11 amounted to $10.00 or sometimes less, on loans 12 whose principal was not exceeding $100.00, and 13 $15.00 or 3% of the loan principal, whichever 14 was greater, on loans whose principal exceeded 15 $100.00. The "carrying charge" was computed 16 at 1% per month of the principal sum, calcu-17 lated in advance, for the duration of the 18 loan, except where the loan was less than 19 $100.00, in which case a flat figure of $1.67
20 per month was substituted for the charge of 1% 21 per month. At the time of making the loan, the 22 nature of the contract charge was explained to 23 the borrower (Tr. 58,59,73,79,128), the 24 borrower agreed to pay it, and the amount 25 thereof was added to the principal of the note.

1 The nature of the carrying charge was also 2 explained to the borrower, the borrower agreed 3 to pay it, and this sum too was added to the 4 principal of the note, to be paid in monthly 5 installments. The note itself provided for 6 interest at the rate of 8% per annum, but only 7 after maturity of each of the payments. (See 8 exhibits 21V and 22V)

9 5. At the time of making the loan, these two 10 charges were computed separately on a scratch
11 sheet, (See exhibits 13M to 20T). These "work 12 sheets" as they are called by taxpayer, were 13 then placed in a folder along with the other 14 documents relating to the loan and became part 15 of the permanent records of the taxpayer.
16 (Tr. 58). Thus the precise amount collected 17 through each of these charges can always be 18 determined from examination of taxpayer's
19 records, and they are segregated at this point.
20 Later on, in taxpayer's bookkeeping system, 21 when payments were made, no distinction was 22 made between income resulting from the contract 23 charge and that resulting from the carrying 24 charge, the entire sums being lumped together 25 as "collected fees". This term "collected

1 fees", also includes moneys collected and 2 immediately paid out for credit reports and 3 similar expenses, in connection with the loans,
4 although taxpayer also has on its books
5 another classification shown as "miscellaneous 6 income", which also includes certain charges, 7 such as filing fees, made by taxpayer.

- 8 6. The amounts attributable to payments of the 9 "contract charge", as above set out, constitute 10 more than 20% of taxpayer's gross income.

11 Thus if the amounts collected under this head-12 ing do not constitute personal holding company 13 income, then taxpayer is not subject to the 14 tax.

- 15 7. The "contract charge", the nature of which was 16 explained to the borrower, was a charge that 17 covered the cost of investigation and setting 18 up the loan on the books. (Tr. 59) In making 19 a loan the first step is the interview with 20 the customer. This is a general overhead
21 expense, and more than 50% of all applicants 22 are weeded out in this first interview.

23 (Tr. 119,126) After the interview, if it is 24 felt that there is justification for the loan 25 (Tr. 60), an application is filled out, and

1 the investigation begins. This is the proce-
2 dure for which the contract charge is made.
3 (Tr. 73) There are many types of loans, each
4 calling for a somewhat different procedure, 5 although certain procedures are standard in 6 all of them. A credit report is always ob-
7 tained on the applicant, sometimes through a
8 credit exchange, which involves paying a fee
9 for the information, (Tr. 61) and sometimes 10 by interviewing, either personally or by 11 telephone, of credit references, or other 12 persons who might have information about the 13 applicant. Sometimes long distance telephone 14 calls, with the attendant expense thereof,
15 are involved. (Tr. 62, 64) Where security
16 is involved, and more than 50% of taxpayer's 17 loans involve security of some sort, (Tr.136), 18 the security itself must be checked, exhaustive-
19 ly. If it is an automobile, the bluebook 20 value is ascertained, the car itself is 21 inspected, the motor and serial number checked, 22 and the condition of the car ascertained. If 23 furniture is involved, it is inspected; (Tr.
24 70,71) If livestock is involved, it, too, is 25 inspected, (Tr. 70) sometimes at considerable

1 expense involved in a trip out of town,
2 (Tr.70); or if trade fixtures or equipment
3 are involved, they are inspected, with similar 4 expenses in connection therewith. (Tr.68) The 5 various documents in connection with the loan, 6 such as mortgages, releases of prior mortgages, 7 and so on, are prepared, usually by the 8 employees of the taxpayer, and notarial work
9 performed. (Tr. 67,72,115) Sometimes automobile 10 titles have to be secured, particularly where 11 out of state titles are involved, and the pro-12 cedure in such instances was described by 13 taxpayer. (Tr. 80,81,82,83,84,116,117). In 14 many instances, prior debts are paid off by 15 taxpayer, and receipts obtained which some-16 times involves the preparation of satisfactions 17 of other mortgages, or releases of other 18 obligations. (Tr. 67,64,65,66) Many times, as 19 in the case of consolidation loans, there is 20 a great deal of work and expense involved in 21 ascertaining the precise amount of the 22 applicant's various obligations, in getting 23 them paid off, or in securing the consent of 24 the various creditors to a monthly payment
25 plan, which will also involve the preparation

1 and execution of certain instruments setting
2 up the consolidated payment plan. (Tr. 64,65, 3 66,101) If actual filing fees are involved,
4 such as the fee for filing a chattel mortgage
5 on an automobile, the fee is collected 6 separately, and classed by taxpayer as 7 "miscellaneous income", but if expenses are 8 incurred such as payment for credit reports, 9 long distance telephone calls, notarial work,
10 and similar expenses, they are not collected 11 separately from the applicant, but are in-12 cluded as a part of the "contract charge"
13 which is assessed on the particular loan.
14 (Tr. 72,62,64,79,100). On most of petitioner's 15 loans, the "contract charge" is not sufficient 16 to cover the cost of the investigation prepara-
17 tory to making the loan. (Tr. 109,110)

18 8. The "carrying charge", calculated at 1% per 19 month or a $1.67 per month on loans under 20 $100.00, also includes services of the type 21 set forth in the preceding paragraph. (Tr. 74, 22 71,101) This is particularly true in the case 23 of consolidation loans, or a trusteeship, in 24 the latter of which taxpayer acts as agent 25 for the borrower in the payment of his various

1 obligations. (Tr. 101,108) This charge also 2 includes all expenses of collection, such as 3 the preparation and mailing of letters 4 requesting payment, foreclosures, tracing of 5 borrowers who have left town, and so on.

6 (Tr. 95)

7 9. Frequently, particularly in the case of loans 8 on automobiles, insurance is obtained for the 9 borrower, (Tr.86) and very frequently credit
10 life insurance, for which a separate charge
11 is made, is also secured for the borrower, 12 either in the form of decreasing term insurance, 13 which provides the borrower with a sufficient 14 sum to pay off the indebtedness, or in a 15 stipulated amount, payable at death, which 16 will pay off the loan and provide a surplus to 17 the borrower. (Tr. 75,117,118)

18 10. Taxpayer did not incorporate for the purpose
19 of obtaining income tax benefits. (Tr. 50-54) 20 In fact, the income taxes actually paid to the 21 government during the periods referred to at 22 all times exceeded the amounts that would have 23 been paid had no corporation been formed, or 24 had the salaries of the stockholders been 25 raised to the point of eliminating corporate

1 income. (Tr.134)

2 11. On the death of Frank M. Wallace, one of the 3 original incorporators of the company, in 1951, 4 his stock descended to his widow, and two 5 children, from whom the present owners of the 6 corporation purchased the stock under date of 7 July 28, 1954, under the terms of a contract 8 which severely restricts the right of the 9 corporation to declare dividends. (Pet. Ex.23)

10 12. Of all the loans made by petitioner during the 11 periods involved, those secured by chattel 12 mortgage constituted, on a dollar basis, from 13 76% to 86% and on a number of loans basis,
14 from 53% to 67%. (Tr. 136)

15 SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR

16 Specification of Error No. 1.

17 The tax court erred in failing to find that 18 the "contract charges" of petitioner are sufficiently 19 related to the services rendered by petitioner for which 20 the charge was made, to exclude the "contract charges" 21 from the definition of personal holding company income
22 interest.

23 Specification of Error No. 2.

24 The tax court erred in concluding, in its
25 finding and opinion, as follows (Tr.156)

1 "On the other hand, here the 2 'contract charge' is not allo-
3 cated for specific services."

4 Specification of Error No. 3.

5 The tax court erred in concluding in its
6 finding and opinion as follows (Tr. 158):

7 "We do not believe that fees
8 charged to borrower, whose only 9 concern is obtaining the use of 10 lender's money, to defray ordin-
11 ary and necessary expenses incurred
12 by the lender in conducting a small 13 loan business are truly separable
14 from interest."

15 Specification of Error No. 4.

16 The tax court erred in concluding in its 17 findings and opinion as follows (Tr. 158):

18 "Consequently, we must conclude 19 that at least 80% of petitioner's
20 gross income in the tax periods 21 involved constitute interest and 22 personal holding company income
23 under the applicable statutes."

24 ARGUMENT

25 Definition of Term "interest".

1 Section 502 of the Internal Revenue Code of 2 1939, and Section 543 of the Internal Revenue Code of 3 1954, define personal holding company income, among 4 the types of income included as "interest". Thus the 5 question resolves itself into a determination whether 6 the income resulting to petitioner herein from the 7 "contract charge" constitutes interest. If it does not, 8 then petitioner is not subject to the tax.

9 The term "interest" has been many times defined.
10 In Old Colony Railroad Company vs. Commissioner of 11 Internal Revenue, 284, U.S. 552, 561; 52 Sup. Ct. 211, 12 214; 76 L.Ed 484, we find the following:

13 "And as respects 'interest', the 14 usual import of the term is the amount 15 which one has contracted to pay for 16 the use of borrowed money."

17 Commissioner of Internal Revenue v. Columbia 18 River Paper Mills, 136 Fed. 2d 1009;

19 Brown-Rogers-Dixson Company v. Commissioner
20 of Internal Revenue, 122 Fed. 2d 347;

21 Penn Mutual Life Insurance Company v.
22 Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 92 Fed.
23 2d 962;

24 Attention is called to two facets of the 25 above definition. First, "interest" is the consideration for the use of borrowed money, and second, we note the use of the word "contracted". In view of the 1 uncontradicted testimony that petitioner explained 2 the "contract charge" to each borrower at the time of 3 making the loan so that the borrower understood that 4 the charge was not being paid for the use of money, but 5 for the making of an investigation, among other things, 6 we have the element of agreement between the parties 7 that the charge referred to was not "interest", but 8 was in fact, a charge made for services to be rendered 9 if the loan was to be made. This testimony is 10 buttressed, (Tr. 73,128) by the explanation made to the 11 borrower that it was a "used" charge, and that if the 12 loan was paid before maturity, a portion of the 13 "carrying charge" pro-rated, would be rebated to the 14 borrower, but that the "contract charge", having been 15 used up by the making of the investigation, would not 16 be rebated.

17 In the Columbia River Paper Mills case, supra, 18 attention is also called to this situation, in the use 19 of the following:

20 "In short, the situation is one where 21 the parties to the transaction, being 22 free to contract, have agreed on the 23 one hand to pay, and on the other hand
24 to accept, a definitely ascertainable 25 sum as compensation for the use of

1 money over a stated period of time."

2 In the present case, the compensation for the 3 use of the money was the "carrying charge" made on the 4 basis of 1% per month, when the loan was over $100.00
5 and on the basis of $1.67 per month, where the loan was 6 under $100.00. This was agreed to by the parties at 7 the time the loan was made.

8 Further, it is abundantly clear from the 9 testimony of Joe H. Irwin, managing director of 10 petitioner, that not only was the "contract charge"
11 explained to the borrower as being a charge for services 12 to be rendered in the nature of an investigation, but 13 that it actually was such a charge, and that such 14 services were actually rendered in each instance. It 15 is unnecessary here to detail again all of the things 16 that were done by petitioner in connection with these 17 loans, and which gave rise to the "contract charge" 18 we think it beyond argument that the testimony estab-19 lishes that we are not dealing with a subterfuge, and 20 that the services were actually rendered.

21 The tax court noted these definitions
22 (Tr. 150) and further noted that the income tax regula-23 tion under the statutes in question states that 24 interest "means any amounts, includable in gross in-25 come, received for the use of money loaned". It will

1 be immediately observed, of course, that this defini-2 tion does not equate interest with gross income, and 3 neither does it make moneys received, if included 4 in gross income, definable as interest.

5 The question then arises whether, in the 6 light of the reported decisions, petitioner is never-7 theless subject to the tax on the ground that the 8 amounts received are to be considered "interest" even 9 though they are not such in reality.

10 There are two leading cases on the subject, 11 from which all the other decisions flow. The first 12 of these, adverse to petitioner herein, is the case 13 of Noteman v. Welch, 26 Fed. Supp. 437, Affirmed, First 14 Circuit, 108 Fed. 2d 206. The second, which explains, 15 modifies, and clarifies the Noteman case, is Working-16 men's Loan Association v. United States, (First Circuit), 17 142 Fed. 2d 359. Since these two cases come very 18 close to being determinative of the issues of the 19 case at bar, they require a rather close analysis.

20 ANALYSIS OF THE NOTEMAN CASE

21 Petitioner in the Noteman case operated a 22 personal loan business under the provisions of the 23 Massachusetts Small Loan Act, which provided, generally 24 speaking, that on loans of $300.00 or less, an overall 25 charge might be made "for interest and expenses" not

1 to exceed 3% a month to be paid by the borrower, and 2 precluded any other charges.

3 Noteman, one of the trustees of National Loan
4 Society of Boston, in accordance with this Act, charged 5 3% per month to the borrowers. The Collector of 6 Internal Revenue, contending that the entire 3% was to 7 be considered as "interest" held the company to be a 8 personal holding company; Noteman petitioned for 9 redetermination, and after an adverse decision, appealed, 10 contending that he was entitled to have a portion of 11 the moneys received under the 3% per month payment 12 considered as charges for services rendered rather than 13 interest. He was unsuccessful. There are some 14 similarities to the present case, but there are also 15 points of divergency, and in particular, one very 16 important difference.

17 It is to be observed first, in analyzing 18 the decision, that the Circuit Court held that the 19 burden was on the taxpayer to show that more than 20% 20 of its income, was for something other than "interest", 21 and then after considering the circumstances of the 22 case, the court held, not that the entire 3% was 23 interest, but that the taxpayer had failed to sustain 24 the burden of proof. On page 215, of the report in 25 108 Fed. 2d, we find the following:

1 "What we do say is that on the present
2 record the taxpayer has failed to sus-
3 tain the burden of proving that over
4 20% of its gross income was derived 5 from sources other than interest. The 6 trial judge could not have so found on 7 the evidence. The taxpayer is therefore 8 not entitled to judgment for recovery of 9 the surtax."

10 On page 214, of the same report, we find the 11 following:

12 "We do not say, in concluding on this 13 branch of the case, that all payments
14 by borrowers from licensed personal 15 finance companies are necessarily 16 "interest" under the Massachusetts
17 Small Loans Law, or under Section 351
18 of the Revenue Act of 1934. If the 19 loan contract calls for payments by 20 delinquent borrowers for extra expenses
21 of collection resulting from their own 22 default, such payments would not be 23 called interest. Williams v. Flowers,
24 1890, 90 Alabama 136, 7 So. 439, 24 Amer.
25 St. Rep. 772. If accounts receivable are

1 pledged as security for the loan, an 2 extra payment to the lender for the 3 actual services of collecting the 4 accounts would not be called interest.
5 In re Mesibovsky, supra. Nothing of 6 this sort appears in the case at bar, 7 for the taxpayer 'takes nothing as 8 security but a plain note or few 9 chattels'. Perhaps notarial and 10 recording fees for chattel mortgages,
11 if required to be paid by the borrower,
12 might be regarded as a charge separable
13 from interest."

14 We think there is an important distinction, in 15 view of what we shall say hereinafter. It would have 16 been one thing to hold that the entire 3% was interest, 17 whether it was charged for the use of money or for 18 services rendered, but it is an entirely different 19 thing to hold that the taxpayer failed to sustain the 20 burden of showing that more than 20% of the income 21 was a charge for something other than the use of 22 money. When the statute refers to "20%" it is 23 referring to a precise proportion, not an approximation, 24 and to arrive at a precise calculation such as this,
25 it is necessary to have some rather precise figures

1 upon which to make the calculations.

2 In the Noteman case, the taxpayer was dealing 3 with a lump charge of 3% per month, and he had no way
4 of segregating precisely what part was for the use
5 of money from the part that was charged for services
6 rendered, even though the Massachusetts Small Loans Act
7 provided that the 3% per month was to be "for interest 8 and expenses". Hence, petitioner there was forced 9 to the expedient of showing the nature of the services 10 rendered, somewhat similar to the present case, for which 11 separate charges were claimed, and then estimating what 12 proportion of the total charge was to be ascribed to 13 the services rather than the interest charge. It is 14 clear that no matter how persuasive his testimony may 15 have been on the subject of services rendered, his 16 ship necessarily foundered on the rock of his inability 17 to prove a precise figure like 20%. The great dis-18 tinction from the present case lies in the fact that 19 petitioner here is able to point out precisely, from 20 its permanent corporate records, the amounts that were 21 received from the "contract charge", and it has been 22 stipulated that this amount exceeds 20% of petitioner's 23 gross income.

24 To add to petitioner's troubles in the 25 Noteman case, the Court pointed out that not only was

1 he unable to segregate "charges" from "interest", 2 but that even his "charges" were a rather amorphous
3 mass of work, some of which benefitted the borrower, 4 but some the lender only, and that the costs or "charges"
5 were spread across all loans and did not apply 6 specifically to a given loan.

7 On this latter point, it may be argued that 8 in the present case, since the contract charge, though 9 applied specifically to a given loan, was only made 10 when a loan was actually completed, the cost of 11 investigations on loans not made would be spread 12 across all loans. But this ignores several factors 13 in the present case. First, there are two charges 14 here, and the investigation costs on loans not made 15 could just as easily, and more properly, be ascribed 16 to the "carrying charge". Second, the testimony
17 is that more than 50% of all applicants are weeded
18 out at the first interview before any "contract charge" 19 is made, and if the applicant gets into the investiga-20 tion stage, the loan is usually made. Third, and 21 perhaps most important of all, the testimony is that 22 on most loans, the "contract charge" is not sufficient
23 to cover the cost of the investigation. (Tr. 109) 24 Thus, some of the investigation costs, even where the 25 "contract charge" is collected, probably spill over

1 into the "carrying charge", and certainly there is no 2 surplus in this "contract charge" which would be able 3 to cover the cost of investigations on loans not made.

4 DECISIONS FOLLOWING THE NOTEMAN RULE

5 Following the Noteman decision, and prior 6 to its modification as hereinafter set forth, were two 7 other cases, decisions in which were adverse to 8 petitioner's position here. In Virginia Loan and 9 Thrift Corporation v. Commission, 2 T.C.M. 27, entered 10 May 10, 1943, the income from investigation fees 11 was held to be interest. Here the taxpayer had 12 actually segregated his investigation fees from the 13 other income, but the important portion of the ruling 14 we think, is contained in the following quotation:

15 "At the hearing the petitioner, through 16 its counsel, admitted that there was no 17 particular investigation made for which 18 an "investigation fee" as allowed by 19 the Virginia statute, was collected
20 from the borrower. In other words, 21 the charge was made as in the case of 22 the admitted interest charge as a part 23 of the borrower's cost of the loan."

24 The distinction is obvious, In the present 25 case we are not dealing with a subterfuge as was the

1 case above. There actually was an investigation in 2 our case, and it was extensive.

3 In United Finance Company, Inc. v. Commissioner, 4 also in 2 T.C.M., at page 38, entered May 8, 1943, we 5 have another holding that service charges should be 6 considered as interest, but here again the taxpayer 7 does not appear to have been able to segregate his 8 income from service charges from that resulting from 9 interest.

10 ANALYSIS OF WORKINGMEN'S LOAN CASE

11 A little over four years after the decision 12 in the Noteman case, the same court, speaking through 13 the same judge, with reference to the same Massachusetts
14 Small Loan Act, decided the case of Workingmen's Loan 15 Association v. United States, 142 Fed. 2d, 359, in an 16 opinion which explains the Noteman decision, modifies 17 it in certain respects, and sets forth clearly the 18 rules which we think should govern the present petition.
19 Among other things, the court said the following,
20 at page 361:

21 "Our holding in the Noteman case was 22 that the taxpayer had failed to sustain 23 the burden of proving that over 20% 24 of its gross income was derived from 25 sources other than interest. We

1 recognize, however, that charges made
2 by lenders in connection with making
3 loans are not necessarily all "interest", 4 within the meaning of paragraph 351,
5 and that the loan contracts may properly 6 call for the rendition of certain 7 specified services by the lender for 8 which a separate charge is to be made
9 in addition to interest.

10 "It is of course true that a borrower
11 may have costs in connection with pro-12 curing a loan, over and above the 13 interest charged for the use of borrowed 14 money. He may, for example have to 15 pay the expense of procuring a credit 16 rating in a mercantile agency, or the 17 fee of a certified public accountant 18 for preparing a balance sheet, or an 19 appraiser's fee for appraising property
20 which he offers as security, or the fee 21 of a lawyer for searching a title. In 22 the case of the small individual 23 borrower, who applies to a personal 24 finance company for a loan, services of 25 this nature, for which the borrower would

1 otherwise have to pay a third person, 2 are not uncommonly rendered by the 3 finance company for a separate charge
4 in addition to interest."

5 Such is precisely the case at bar. Further 6 in the case at bar, the charges for such investigation 7 are separately calculated at the time of making the 8 loan, and are capable of precise ascertainment. It
9 makes no difference that in the Workingmen's case, 10 the separate charge was called an "initial charge", 11 for it is precisely the sort of charge that is made 12 in the present case. The court, in considering the 13 charge, used the following language:

14 "In making loans and keeping its 15 books, the taxpayer has had the practice 16 of separating what it regards as the 17 interest charges from charges for services
18 to the borrowers in investigating,
19 identifying, inspecting, and appraising
20 the credit and security of the borrower.
21 A so-called "initial charge" for 22 these separate services is made known 23 to the borrower before the loan is 24 consummated and is collected in advance 25 as a flat sum which does not vary with

1 the duration of the loan. These 2 initial charges, as distinguished from 3 interest, are adjusted to the nature of 4 the loan. In the case of unsecured
5 loans, the borrower makes an initial 6 payment of $3.00 to $5.00 depending 7 upon the size of the loan, plus an 8 additional sum equal to 2% of the face
9 of the note. In the case of secured 10 loans there is an initial charge of 11 $5.00, plus an additional charge 12 varying between 2% and 7%, depending 13 upon the type of security involved. The 14 interest rate, as distinguished from 15 the initial charge, is 1% per month
16 on the unpaid balance, this is the only 17 charge mentioned in the form of promissory 18 note executed by borrowers from the 19 taxpayers.

20 It is to be emphasized that these initial 21 charges are adjusted to the amount and 22 type of loan, secured or unsecured, and 23 are specifically allocated, by agreement 24 with the borrower to the expense of 25 'investigation, identification, inspection

1 and appraisal.' They are 'the 2 customary and usual charges made by 3 concerns engaged in business similar 4 to that conducted by the plaintiff.'
5 They are paid in advance, and do not 6 depend upon the duration of the loan,
7 whereas in the Noteman case the blanket 8 charge for 'expenses', was fixed at 9 2% per month on the unpaid balances
10 and ran along during the whole life
11 of the loan. There was no suggestion
12 that the present taxpayer's charges
13 for specific initial services were 14 excessive and a mere device for con-15 cealing an exaction not permitted by 16 law."

17 Neither is there any suggestion that Western Credit 18 Company's "contract charge" is excessive, or a mere 19 device for concealing an exaction not permitted by law.
20 The similarities are striking. Western Credit, too, 21 separates on its books, in the form of its work sheets,
22 what it regards as the interest charge from charges 23 for services to borrowers in investigation, identifying, 24 inspecting, and appraising the credit and security
25 of the borrower. The charge is collected in advance

1 as a flat sum, by being added to the principal of the 2 note, and it does not vary with the duration of the 3 loan. In each case an entirely separate charge of 1%
4 per month was made on the unpaid balance. This, among 5 other things, is the interest on the loan.

6 It will be recalled that in the present case 7 the contention is made by taxpayer that even the 8 "carrying charge" contains some elements of services 9 rendered rather than being all interest. That this is 10 true is demonstrated by the testimony of petitioner
11 (Tr.73) and hence the "carrying charge" did not consti-12 tute "interest" only. The court will also note (Tr.45, 13 46) that counsel for petitioner conceded that in view 14 of the authorities, the segregation into its component 15 parts of this "carrying charge" could not be made.
16 Reference at the time was made to the distinction
17 between the Noteman case and the Workingmen's case.
18 We feel that the "carrying charge" of petitioner is 19 analogous to the 3% a month charge considered by the 20 court in the Noteman case, and is therefore subject 21 to being considered all "interest", whether such is 22 the reality or not, but that the "contract charge" 23 is precisely analogous to the "initial charge" being 24 considered in the Workingmen's case.

1 OTHER APPLICABLE DECISIONS

2 It will be observed, we think, in following 3 out the other cases relating to the subject, that the 4 ability of the taxpayer to segregate his charges is 5 usually, if not always, the controlling factor.

6 Another case, which at first blush appears 7 to be contrary to the position taken here by petitioner, 8 but which on analysis proves to be distinguishable,
9 is that of Girard Investment Company v. Commissioner, 10 122 Fed. 2d 843. Here too, it is clear from the 11 overall language of the opinion, that the petitioner 12 was unable to segregate the specific amounts charged 13 for services rendered from those charged as interest, 14 and because of this the taxpayer was caught in the 15 same web as was spun in the Noteman case. For instance, 16 the court says the following:

17 "Learned counsel, who argued the case 18 as amicus curiae in that case, (referring 19 to Noteman) may have given, and no 20 doubt has given some polish to his 21 earlier contentions. They are, however, 22 in essence the same, and we think,
23 should receive the reception previously
24 accorded. Counsel maintained then 25 and now: first, that the return charged

1 for the use of money loaned in small 2 amounts is not interest; second, that 3 the plain and specific words of the 4 act are over-ridden by a general inten-
5 tion not to apply them to operating 6 companies; and third, that a subsequent 7 amendment is clarifying rather than 8 altering."

9 Not one of these contentions is advanced by 10 present petitioner. Our contention is that taxpayer 11 made a separate charge for services rendered, and that 12 charge is not interest. We submit that had counsel 13 in the Girard case been able to make the distinction that 14 can and is being made here, he would have done so, and 15 the arguments which the above quotation indicates he 16 made, would have been unnecessary.

17 In the Girard case the court also says:

18 "With many small loans to the kind of 19 people who need small sums, the effort 20 of administration and the insecurity of 21 payment is more pronounced. The small 22 loan companies have advocated and been 23 granted rates covering this increased 24 cost and risk. It is a non sequitur to 25 use this justifiable excess in nominal

1 interest as in argument in support of 2 its own exclusion from the general
3 word "interest" and the limitation of 4 that word to pure "interest".

5 The foregoing is clearly true, but it does not apply to 6 the present case. If, because of the effort of adminis-
7 tration and the greater risk, a greater rate of interest 8 is allowed and charged, it is perfectly true that the 9 nature of the charge is not changed by being made 10 greater. But where something entirely different is 11 done, whether for the same reasons or others, and 12 an entirely separate and distinct charge is made,
13 called a "contract charge" in the nature of a flat 14 charge for investigating the risk, and other services, 15 then the separate charge is exactly what it is called,
16 and it isn't interest.

17 A fourth case, which in the circuit court went 18 adversely to the taxpayer, but which upon examination 19 proves rather favorable to the present petitioner, is 20 that of Bond Auto Loan Corporation v. Commissioner, 21 153 Fed 2d, 50. Here a Missouri statute provided that 22 when a loan was secured by a chattel mortgage on a motor 23 vehicle, because of the extra hazards involved in 24 such loans, the corporation might, in addition to the 25 regular 8% interest charge, exact a charge not greater

1 than $20.00. The statute also provided that if the 2 company retained any part of the fee for its own use,
3 the note evidencing the indebtedness should bear a 4 statement that the maker had the option of conveying to 5 the lender the vehicle securing the note, regardless 6 of its condition, in full satisfaction of the balance
7 due. The question arose whether these extra hazard 8 charges were to be considered as interest or as some-9 thing else. The taxpayer contended that the extra 10 hazard charge was not paid by the borrower for the use 11 of the money borrowed, but was paid for the contractual 12 right to satisfy the loan by delivering the automobile 13 to the lender. The court rejected this, holding that 14 the extra hazard charge was additional interest.

15 Significant in the case is the breakdown
16 of the taxpayer's income. We find the following
17 language:

18 "A breakdown of the gross income of the 19 corporation for the fiscal year ending
20 April 30, 1939, discloses that a total
21 of 9.14% of the corporation's income
22 was derived from the regular 8% interest
23 allowed by Missouri law, that 18.06%
24 was derived from examination and investi-
25 gation fees, that 71.11% was derived from

1 the extra hazard charges, and that 1.69%
2 was from miscellaneous items."

3 We feel that the court quite properly held 4 that the extra hazard charges were in reality additional 5 compensation for the use of money. The court used the 6 following language:

7 "The corporation's business is that of a 8 money lender, not an insurer. It would 9 seem strange, that, of its total gross
10 income for the year ending April 30,
11 1939, only 9.14% thereof was received 12 for the use of money loaned, and 71.11%
13 was received for insuring its borrowers
14 against the possibility of a deficiency 15 judgment. The extra charges appear to 16 be authorized primarily for the benefit 17 of the lender, not the borrower."

18 On page 51, the court also used the following
19 language:

20 "We are convinced that the extra 21 hazard charges which constituted such 22 a large percentage of the corporation's 23 total income for the taxable years,
24 were received for the use of money
25 loaned. The fact that in order to be

1 permitted to retain for itself any 2 part of the extra charges exacted, the 3 Missouri law required the corporation
4 to agree to accept the security in full 5 settlement of the indebtedness and that 6 the corporation complied with that law 7 does not alter this conclusion. The 8 extra charge is authorized 'on account 9 of the extra hazards involved in such 10 loans.' In other words the charge is 11 authorized because of the extra hazard 12 to the lender in making such loans. The 13 Missouri statute does not authorize 14 extra charge in consideration of the 15 option. It authorizes it in recogni-
16 tion of insufficiency of an 8% interest 17 rate, and protects the borrower to the 18 extent that, having paid the additional 19 charge, he will not subsequently be 20 subject to a deficiency judgment in the 21 case of foreclosure of his security."

22 All of the foregoing seems persuasive to us.
23 At the same time, it also seems persuasive to us that 24 the plain implication of the case is that the 18.06%
25 of the taxpayer's income which was derived from examina-

1 tion and investigation fees was not interest income.
2 This seems to have been tacitly accepted by all of the 3 parties to the case. It is also to be observed that 4 since 18.06% of the income was segregated as being 5 derived from examination and investigation fees, there 6 was scarcely anything else that the 71.11% could be 7 called, except interest.

8 In the present case, a figure in excess of 20% 9 of petitioner's gross income, by stipulation, derives 10 from the "contract charge" which from the testimony
11 clearly appears to have been a charge for examination 12 and investigation, and other services rendered to the 13 borrower in connection with his qualifying for the 14 loan. It is similar to the 18.06% in the Bond case, 15 which tacitly was not included in the term "interest."

16 SPECIFICATION OF ERROR NO. 1

17 In arriving at its decision for respondent
18 and against petitioner, the Tax Court imposed upon 19 petitioner a burden of proof far beyond that which 20 the First Circuit Court laid down in either the 21 Noteman or the Workingmen's case. Having in mind that 22 the testimony and evidence in this case was uncontro-23 verted, the Tax Court in effect recognized that 24 practical distinctions were more of form than of sub-25 stance between the Workingmen's case and the case at 1 bar, (Tr. 156) and then proceeded in the balance of the 2 opinion (Tr. 156-159) to conclude that the "contract 3 charge" in this case was not sufficiently related to 4 the services performed by the petitioner in investiga-

5 tion and setting up the loan, to justify the exclusion
6 of the "contract charge" from interest. For instance, 7 the Tax Court concluded (Tr. 157-158) "the evidence 8 provides no basis for determining the costs of performing 9 services that can clearly be said to be rendered for 10 the borrower as distinguished from the general costs 11 of operating a business of this nature." Yet, the 12 uncontroverted record is that the borrower was informed 13 what the contract charge was being used for, and that 14 on most loans the expense of the investigation for which 15 the contract charge was made, exceeded the amount of 16 the charge. We do not see how the petitioner could 17 have more clearly sustained the burden of proof laid 18 down in the Workingmen's case, than it did under the 19 circumstances. The Tax Court, actually, seems to be 20 impelled to the idea that petitioner must prove its 21 case beyond a reasonable doubt in that the "contract 22 charge" must have an exact, unalterable, direct, 23 specific relationship to the particular services
24 rendered a particular borrower with respect to a parti-
25 cular loan. This is not the rule of either the Noteman

1 or the Workingmen's case, and a taxpayer is not held 2 to any such strict burden of proof as that which the 3 Tax Court apparently deemed essential to a determina-4 tion of the case in favor of the petitioner. Although 5 the tax court did not expressly say so in its opinion, 6 the net result of the decision is that, in order to 7 beat the burden the Tax Court imposes upon a taxpayer 8 under the decision in the case at bar, the lender would 9 have to precisely account for the actual disbursement of 10 the "contract charge" in the course of its business.
11 In essence, the tax court would have the taxpayer
12 prove his case by showing, not only what the charge
13 was made for but in addition, specifically and precisely 14 how it was spent. If, petitioner's evidence as to 15 utilization of the contract charge had been controverted, 16 so that there was an issue before the court respecting 17 how and for what the "contract charge" was actually 18 utilized, there might be some justification for 19 sustaining more particular proof in this case. Where 20 utilization of the "contract charge" was shown to be 21 less than the expenses toward which the same was 22 directed, and further shown to be a reasonable charge 23 for the services entailed, the Tax Court was not 24 entitled to insist that the petitioner show more than 25 it already had with respect to the utilization of the 1 contract charge.

2 In finding as it did in this connection, it
3 seems to us that the Tax Court has ignored one of the 4 most basic and fundamental rules of statutory construc-
5 tion, namely, that a tax statute should be construed
6 most favorably to the taxpayer. In the Old Colony 7 Railroad case, supra, 52 Sup. Ct., on page 214, we 8 find the following:

9 "If there were doubt as to connotation 10 of the term, and another meaning might 11 be adopted, the fact of its use in a 12 tax statute would incline the scale to 13 the construction most favorable to the 14 taxpayer. (citing cases)"

15 If the undoubted rule of statutory construction is to 16 be followed, it would seem that the tendency should be 17 to relax, rather than restrict, the tentacles thrown 18 about the unfortunate taxpayer by the Noteman decision.

19 SPECIFICATION OF ERROR NO. 2

20 One of the distinctions which the tax court 21 attempted to make between the case at bar and the 22 Workingmen's case, was that in the present case, the 23 "contract charge" was not allocated for specific 24 services, whereas in the Workingmen's case the equivalent 25 charge in that case was specifically "allocated by

1 agreement with the borrower, to the extent of 2 'investigation, identification, inspection and 3 appraisal'" of the credit and security of the borrower 4 (Tr. 156). The court goes on to observe that such 5 distinctions are more imaginary than real, and more of 6 form than substance, unless it is shown that the charge
7 was actually used to cover the cost of the services 8 specified, and those specified are services to the 9 borrower rather than to the lender or services normally 10 required in the operation of a small loan business. On 11 the evidence of the case at bar, the tax court was not 12 justified in attempting to observe any distinction 13 between this case and the Workingmen's case since, in 14 the case at bar, the "contract charge" was also 15 explained and agreed to by the borrower. This casual 16 distinction, coupled with the Tax Court's observation
17 which followed, to the effect that these differences 18 are more of form than substance unless it is shown that 19 the charge is actually used to cover the cost of the 20 services specified, emphasizes the unwillingness of 21 the Tax Court to be persuaded by the weight of the 22 evidence, unless the evidence prove petitioner's case 23 beyond the shadow of any doubt. For, as we have 24 indicated, under the discussion of the preceding speci-25 fication of error, the uncontroverted record was that

1 the "contract charges", agreed to by the borrower,
2 were directly related to the expenses of investigation
3 and setting up the loan, and in fact, in most cases 4 were insufficient to cover this expense. It appears, 5 in this regard, that the Tax Court in effect is 6 holding that after the Workingmen's case is considered 7 as having modified the Noteman case, forever after 8 every possible taxpayer in a similar situation, in 9 order to prevail must prove exactly the same circum-10 stances, word for word, as were present in the 11 Workingmen's case. If even a minor difference can be 12 found, so minuscule as to require almost a microscope 13 to discover, then the subsequent taxpayer will not be 14 considered as falling within the rule of the Workingmen's 15 case, but rather within the rule of the Noteman case.

16 SPECIFICATION OF ERROR NO. 3

17 The conclusion of the Tax Court which is the 18 subject of specification of error No. 3 furnishes 19 perhaps the most obvious point at which the Tax Court 20 departed from the burden of proof rule laid down in 21 the Workingmen's case, and imposed a much greater 22 burden of proof upon the petitioner. It is apparent 23 that, at this point in the opinion, the Tax Court 24 abandoned serious consideration of the rule of the 25 Workingmen's case in stating, as it did, that the Tax

1 Court did not believe that fees charged to a borrower
2 whose only concern is obtaining the use of lender's
3 money, to defray ordinary and necessary expenses
4 incurred by the lender in conducting a small loan 5 business are truly separable from interest. This 6 statement by the Tax Court, if it goes unchallenged, 7 destroys completely the effect of the burden of proof
8 rule in the Workingmen case. In substance, the Tax
9 Court has said that all of the expenses attributable 10 to making a loan are the business expenses of the 11 lender, and all payments made by the borrower whose 12 only concern is obtaining the use of the lender's
13 money, are necessarily included in interest. This 14 premise would make it absolutely impossible for any 15 lender to receive from any borrower, anything other 16 than interest, regardless of the contractual intention 17 or understanding of the parties. The Tax Court, in 18 effect, by this statement is striking down the definition
19 of the term "interest" laid down in the Old Colony case 20 cited, supra, page 13 and establishes that a lender and 21 a borrower have no right to contract except for a 22 payment of interest by the borrower to the lender.
23 Yet, a proper definition of "interest", as seen herein-24 above, is that "interest" is actually that amount of 25 money which the parties contract to pay for the use of

1 the money. It is a platitude to suggest the borrower's 2 only concern is obtaining the use of the lender's money.
3 This is always so, and the statement begs the question,
4 since the issue is not the fact that the borrowers
5 only concern is obtaining the use of the lender's 6 money, but the question of the amount of money which 7 the borrower contracted to pay for the use of the money
8 borrowed. It was likewise inaccurate for the Tax Court 9 to conclude that the charges were to defray the ordinary 10 and necessary expenses incurred by the lender in a small 11 loan business and are not separable from interest since, 12 as we have indicated, the charges made by the petitioner 13 which constituted the contract charges either had to 14 be paid by the borrower, performed and paid for by a 15 third party, or paid by the lender, or else there 16 would be no loan.

17 We see no essential difference between this 18 situation and the situation where an owner of a home 19 tries to borrow money, using the home as security.
20 Money is paid for the examination of an abstract, where 21 abstracts are used as is the case in Montana, and also 22 for bringing the abstract down to date. Money is paid 23 for the drafting of a mortgage and note and such other 24 documents as may be indicated by the particular circum-
25 stances. If the loan happens to be a Federal Housing

1 Administration loan, an appraisal must be made by the 2 FHA, and payment must be made therefor. All of these 3 items are paid by the borrower, but so far as we have 4 heard to date, nobody has as yet called them interest.
5 It is clear therefore, that monies paid by a borrower 6 are not necessarily interest, but can be, and frequent-7 ly are, charges for services rendered. Particularly 8 is this so where, as in the present case, the nature 9 of the charge is explained to the borrower before he 10 borrows the money. If he does not want to pay the 11 charges he can simply go elsewhere for his loan. They 12 are voluntarily paid by the borrower, with full know-13 ledge that they are charges for an examination of 14 the credit risk, and not as interest.

15 An interesting contrast to the attitude of 16 the Tax Court here in attempting to broaden the defini-
17 tion of "interest" to the detriment of the taxpayer
18 was the finding of the Tax Court in Elk Discount Cor-
19 poration v. Commissioner, 4 TC 196, Decision, 14,179
20 October 17, 1944. In this latter case, the peti-
21 tioner was in the business of purchasing conditional 22 sales contracts covering automobiles sold by dealers, 23 who when they sold the car took a cash down payment 24 and a contract for the balance, which contract
25 obviously included interest charges on the unpaid

1 balance to be paid by the automobile purchaser. Not-2 withstanding the undoubted fact that there was an 3 element of interest in the amounts later paid by the 4 purchaser of the automobile, whether paid to the 5 automobile dealer or to the petitioner Elk Discount 6 Corporation, the tax court held that no part of these 7 payments were "interest" within the meaning of the 8 personal holding company statutes. This decision 9 cites several other holdings to the same effect and 10 in arriving at its decision, quotes from Gould v. Gould 11 245 U.S. 151, in which the court stated:

12 "In the interpretation of statutes
13 levying taxes, it is the established
14 rule not to extend their provisions,
15 by implication beyond the clear import
16 of the language used, or to enlarge
17 their operations so as to embrace
18 matters not specifically pointed out.
19 In case of doubt they are construed
20 most strongly against the government
21 and in favor of the citizen."

22 In the instant case, in holding as it did,
23 the tax court, it seems to us, completely disregarded 24 the above rule, and erred in concluding it was entitled 25 to strike down the law of contract between a borrower

1 and a lender through the medium of increasing the 2 lender's burden of proof in this case.

3 SPECIFICATION OF ERROR NO. 4

4 This specification goes to the ultimate
5 conclusion of the Tax Court that 80% of petitioner's 6 gross income, which included the "contract charges", 7 constituted "interest" and thus personal holding 8 company income. If petitioner's specifications of 9 error preceding this specification, or any one of them, 10 is well taken, then the ultimate conclusion of the 11 Tax Court is incorrect. Since the parties stipulated 12 and the court find that the "contract charges" were 13 more than 20% of the petitioner's gross income for 14 the period involved, a determination by this court 15 on review that petitioner sustained its burden of 16 proof in showing that the "contract charge" was not 17 an amount paid for the use of money, would render the 18 Tax Court's conclusion erroneous.

19 CONCLUSION

20 Petitioner respectfully submits that, upon 21 the uncontroverted facts and the applicable authorities, 22 petitioner sustained its burden of proving that its 23 "contract charges" which constitute more than 20% of 24 its gross income, was not amounts agreed to be paid 25 for the use of money, do not constitute personal

1 holding income interest and that, for these reasons,
2 the court below erred in the manner specified.
3 Appellant respectfully urges that this court upon 4 review of the record and in the light of the foregoing 5 discussion enter its order reversing the decision of 6 the Tax Court in this case and determining the 7 petitioner is not liable for the tax deficit claimed 8 by the Commissioner.

9 Respectfully submitted,
